A Gamer’s Headphone Video

- ① On the video platform LoopLine, popular gamer Nia Vale posts a 90-second clip called “My Sound Setup for Finals Week.” She opens with quick shots of the EchoArc X2 headphones beside her keyboard, then says the brand sent her a pair to test. In small white type at the top of the screen, the video reads, “Paid partnership with EchoArc.” Nia describes the ear cushions and noise control while upbeat music plays. Each time she names the headphones, a bright EchoArc logo appears in the lower corner. The clip is edited like a personal recommendation, not a traditional television ad.
- ② Below the video, a blue button says “Shop EchoArc X2,” and it leads to the brand’s online store. The description box repeats the button’s message, includes the current price, and gives viewers the code NIA15 for 15 percent off. It also says, “Use my link to support the channel.” A note after the link states that Nia may earn a commission on qualifying purchases. Near the end, she tells viewers that the code expires Sunday at midnight. Comments asking whether the headphones work with school laptops receive a reply from EchoArc’s verified account, which posts the same store link.
- ③ During the final ten seconds, the screen splits in two. On one side, Nia wears the headphones in a crowded study hall. On the other, an animated meter moves from “ordinary sound” to “focus mode,” although the video does not explain how the meter was measured. Large text says, “Hear more. Miss less.” A countdown clock appears beside the code, and a voice says, “Tap below before the offer ends.” The final frame shows the product, the price, the store button, and the words “Chosen by Nia Vale.” Viewers can still learn something about the headphones, but they should examine why the clip presents that information in this particular way.

PART 3 • YOUR TURN (SAMPLE ANSWER)

In a sneaker video, the caption "Paid partnership with SprintStep" shows that the creator has a business relationship with the brand, which may affect how viewers judge the review. A "Buy Now" button that opens the brand store directs viewers straight to a purchase. These details can make the video seem more like promotion than an independent recommendation.

Accept accurately identified promotional details and explanations of how they direct, reward, or pressure viewers to buy. For the open response, accept any plausible product scenario with exactly three sentences, two clear commercial influences, and an explanation of their effect.
