The Green Team Shares Findings

1. After testing which garden bed held moisture longest, the Green Team had results to share. Their chart showed that the bed with compost stayed damp for more days than the bed with only sand. Before presenting, the team asked two questions: Who needs this information? What is the clearest way for that audience to understand it?

2. For the principal, the team chose a one-page written report. The principal could read it later and use the results when planning garden supplies. The report included a title, a small data table, and a recommendation to add compost. Written words and numbers worked well because the principal needed details that could be saved and checked.

3. At the family garden night, the team used an oral talk with a large bar graph. One student explained the test, while another pointed to each bar. Families could see the difference quickly and ask questions. For younger students, the team made a short video with pictures, labels, and spoken explanations. This multimodal choice helped children watch, listen, and see the results at the same time.

PART 3 · YOUR TURN (SAMPLE ANSWER)

Our class surveyed 24 students about lunchtime activities. I am giving the principal a written report because she can save it while planning recess equipment. The report says that 15 students chose drawing, and it includes a small table of all the results.

Accept any reasonable audience and mode if the student explains why the mode fits that audience. The response should state a result and include a useful feature, such as a graph, table, images, labels, or spoken explanation.
